

Sample Answer – About 1 minute

People might choose these ways of travelling because they offer completely different experiences. Travelling by train is usually a convenient and comfortable option, as passengers can sit back, enjoy the scenery and reach their destination without having to worry about driving. It can also be a good opportunity to spend quality time with other people during the journey.

Hiking, by contrast, is likely to appeal to people who are looking for a sense of adventure and want to explore places off the beaten track. Being surrounded by nature can be extremely rewarding, and reaching a destination on foot can give travellers a real sense of achievement. However, it requires more physical effort and careful preparation.

Partner's Question

Which way of travelling would you enjoy more?

I'd definitely prefer travelling by train because I could enjoy the scenery while having a comfortable journey. That said, hiking would be more appealing if I wanted to get away from it all and experience somewhere completely different.

Useful Vocabulary in Context

enjoy the scenery

We spent most of the journey enjoying the scenery as we travelled through the countryside.

reach your destination

Taking a direct flight is often the quickest way to reach your destination.

spend quality time with someone

Going on holiday together gives families a chance to spend quality time with each other.

a sense of adventure

Trying an unfamiliar activity can give you a real sense of adventure.

off the beaten track

We prefer visiting places off the beaten track rather than crowded tourist attractions.

a sense of achievement

Completing a difficult project gave the whole team a real sense of achievement.

get away from it all

Some people go to the countryside at weekends to get away from it all and relax.